

Surveillance?

10/4/95

Leaving home the usual time for a Monday, Wednesday or Friday, at about 4:45 a.m., with the usual pint of water each of those mornings, when I placed the container in the caddy that fits atop the hump in the floor of the front seat, I noticed that it had been moved quite a bit. This was clear from the fact that it was farther to the back than is convenient for reaching down to get it and from the very visible fact that the dust I am not able to remove and the debris was not at the front of the place the caddy then was. Dust and small debris. The plastic caddy had pointed teeth to keep it from slipping. It could not have slipped that far in any event, four to five inches. While I have no reason to believe that there is any interest in planting a bug in my ^{car} van I could think of no other reason for anyone writing to be in it, or to do anything to it. I have trouble believing anyone wanted to bug it, or to replace a bug already there. But without question, that caddy had been moved, and quite some distance.
